The actual working image is saved in the

Layers panel

(covered in Chapter 6).

You can also save a flattened image. When you're finished, be sure to place your layers back in the Layers panel so that you can work them once again. To move a layer back into the Layers panel, choose Layer > Move Layer to Back. See the upcoming section "Finding the layers panel" for more on working with layers and other features of Photoshop. ## Using layer masks Each individual layer in a Photoshop file has a layer mask that serves two purposes: * It can be used to adjust the layer that it belongs to. * You can use it to hide areas of an image. To apply a layer mask, select the layer mask thumbnail on the Layers panel or choose Layer > Layer Mask > Reveal All. To hide the layer mask, deselect the checkbox in the mask thumbnail or choose Layer > Layer Mask > Hide All. When you adjust a layer's opacity, a `_layer mask_` of the same size that is automatically created in the layer mask thumbnail is applied to the layer, and you see an area of the layer's background color. Figure 4-9 demonstrates this.

mask is created when you change the opacity of the layer by adjusting the layer's transparency setting. Figure 4-10 illustrates a layer mask that's been applied to a layer. When you adjust the layer's opacity, the area covered by the mask is white, and the rest of the image appears as it does when the layer is set to 100 percent opacity. The white area is the highlight color, and the color of the area covered by the mask is the midtone color.

FIGURE 4-10: This layer mask can be used to adjust the opacity of the layer without changing its colors. A layer mask's area is controlled by the layer's Opacity setting, as shown in Figure 4-11.

You can choose from four types of opacity to determine how the transparency of the image layer appears to the viewer. FIGURE 4-11: Choosing a layer's

Opacity setting determines the transparency of the layer and the area it covers. #

Layer Mask feature is quite handy, but it can also cause problems if you try to apply

We also gave Orion the blue steel goopy legs to fly along the walls, and the blue rods and red ends that are the grip of each tail. All of this is real brass (and not just a poor photo). It's held together by a single screw in the tassel's tip. Not only can they maneuver up to 18 different forms with the brushes, these guys can also paint freely, using paint tubes, with pencils, and even (though not pictured) with fingers. They're also designed to fit the concept of "variety," spreading their rendering all over the wall. But the real genius of the Orion brushes is what people like to call "texture." They're designed with a surprising amount of dimension in a relatively small area, allowing for a larger variety of appearances. We decided to put them in the center of a wall at the Daegu School of Art and Design, bringing all this texture together. The “little rifle at the sky,” or ah-ris (Yarrow Mural), is actually painted in the gutter between the Orion’s eyes. These walls are made of corrugated cardboard, and the painting, which was previously in black on white cardboard, is still wet. We gave it three layers: a thin layer of paint to darken, some white, and then a thicker layer of blue to give it depth. It's only a temporary way to stop the painting from coming off the wall and dripping onto a floor below.

How to use the Clone Stamp tool By default, the Clone Stamp tool works on the active layer. You can also use the Clone Stamp tool on any image that you've previously set to "Global" or "Clone".

You can also use the Clone Stamp tool on layers that are not active.

To use the tool, click on the tool (the square tool icon) on the tool bar. The active layer will immediately change to a soft-edged rectangle.

Simply drag around an area of your image to copy and paste pixels, and then click on the active layer. You can use the tool in two ways: to cover an area, or to fill it in. To use the tool to cover, simply drag the cursor around the area to be covered, then click. To use the tool to fill in, first select an area to fill by clicking on that area, then simply drag the cursor over the area. Then, click. If you click and drag across an area that is already filled with pixels, the Clone Stamp tool will replace any pixels that are already there. You can use the tool with multiple layers to clone pixels from one area to another. How to find a brush in Photoshop The brushes in Photoshop are organized into various categories.
