President Donald Trump speaks to the media before departing the White House for travel to New York, Wednesday, Aug. 22, 2018, in Washington. Associated Press/Evan Vucci The final minutes before the midterm elections get underway are a lot less exciting for the media than they are for politicians. With less than 24 hours to go before polls open, the television news networks have used up much of their coverage on the final campaign stops by 2020 presidential hopefuls and politicians who seek to become their party's 2018 nominee, leaving the political talking heads to tell reporters what the polls mean in the 2016-2018 election. CBS' "Face the Nation" host Margaret Brennan said on Wednesday, "I think it's a very good morning for Democrats. And I think it's a very good morning for Republicans. Because the polling is so tight there, a lot of people in both parties say they're shaking hands. And it's good for those two parties, but it's bad for the people who are watching the news and trying to figure out what's going on." "The Washington Post" political reporter Robert Costa said on "Today," "You can see Democrats using the race as a referendum on the president and running on the fact that they stand against Trump." He added, "The president has been gone for a long time. If he ends up not getting elected, then people will view it as a midterm loss for the Democrats even though they may very well lose the House." On "CBS This Morning," political reporter Nancy Cordes added, "The president's approval rating continues to tick down after his tumultuous first five years in office and his bruising primary battle against Hillary Clinton. He isn
