After school care and homework support for low-income families, U.S. House members say it's time for their Senate colleagues to get on board. "We're going to make sure this legislation never sees the light of day,"

Fred Woodson, executive director of the National Association for the Education of Young Children, told the National Parents Union at a briefing last week, calling the Senate bill a “chilling, disastrous, lack of any common sense parental education legislation.”

Woodson, the principal investigator behind an earlier version of the Senate bill, said NPEYC submitted an opt-out proposal to the Senate committee. But it ultimately did not appear in the bill text. Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va., who was among the group of eight members of the House that drafted its own version of the EAC bill, told NPU that the Senate bill “failed to meet the many needs of thousands of parents who want a secure source of after school care and support.” Moran said the House version will be sent to Rep. Kevin Brady, R-Texas, the chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, for consideration, adding that it’s the focus of the group’s work. The House bill, which Moran said was crafted after dozens of meetings with parents and teachers across the nation, includes an opt-out provision to allow parents to forgo after school care for kindergarten through fifth grade and after school tutoring for students in the sixth grade or higher. The legislation doesn’t exempt a child from doing homework or make changes to homework requirements for middle-schoolers, though it does eliminate after school care for students in the sixth grade or above who've already completed all of their homework. The House bill also provides up to $2,000 a year of after school care for low-income children and does away with caps on tuition, requiring that tuition be determined by families.
