This paper shows the potential of measuring the intrinsic fluorescence of Bacillus subtilis for monitoring viable vegetative cells during fermentation. Viable cells were successfully separated from the viable spores of the microorganism. The latter could be visualized using fluorescent microscopy but fluorescence could not be measured. Fluorescent emission of viable vegetative cells can be measured using a spectrofluorimeter. The intrinsic fluorescence properties of the microorganism differ significantly from that of the spores. The ratio of the two peaks in the emission spectrum of the microorganism decreased during the process of fermentation. Intrinsic fluorescence of a cell could be measured at 495 nm following excitation at 400 nm, an excellent choice to screen submerged fermentations. The authors demonstrated the advantages of using intrinsic fluorescence to monitor the growth of the cells after fermentation.Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is a medical imaging modality that can create images of the inside of a human body without using x-rays or other ionizing radiation. MRI uses a powerful magnet to create a strong, static magnetic field in which a patient is placed. Radiofrequency (RF) energy is applied to the patient to create nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) signals that can be detected by RF coils.
