Inflammatory bowel diseases (IBD) are characterized by chronic relapsing inflammation. Although the pathogenesis of IBD is not completely understood, it is believed that cytokines produced by inflammatory cells are involved in the pathogenesis of IBD. In this article, the current status of stem cell therapy in clinical trials of IBD is reviewed. So far, autologous and allogeneic hematopoietic stem cell transplantation is used for treatment of patients with relapsing and steroid-dependent IBD. Moreover, gene therapy using cytokine-transfected donor cells is also a potential treatment modality. Gene therapy has a risk of tumor formation, teratoma formation and transmission of oncogenes, and immune rejection. For this reason, recent studies on the therapeutic potential of induced pluripotent stem cells are discussed. Cloning and functional expression of Na(+)-K+ transport systems from the kidney. In conclusion, we have isolated the MCT1 cDNA encoding for the apical Na(+)-K+ pump from mouse kidney and characterized its cloned protein. MCT1 is 73% identical to the rat protein and 71% identical to the human homologue. It shows sequence conservation of membrane-spanning domains, presumed N- and C-terminal regions, as well as the ATP binding domain (Walker A, motif A). Anionic residues at the center of the cytoplasmic loop may form the well-conserved Na(+)-binding sites. The K(+) binding site is present in the amphipathic helical C-terminal domain. The cloned protein produces K(+)-stimulated and Na(+)-dependent and -independent ATP
