To explore the clinical significance of cyclooxygenase-2

(COX-2) expression in predicting the prognosis of patients with operable breast cancer and to identify whether neoadjuvant chemotherapy (NAC) influences the effect of COX-2 expression on prognosis. Eighty-four patients with stages I and II breast cancer received NAC. Levels of COX-2 expression in tumor tissues were measured and the relationship between COX-2 expression and the clinicopathological factors, the effect of COX-2 expression on disease-free survival (DFS), and overall survival

(OS) was analyzed. COX-2 expression was not correlated with age, histological grade, lymph node metastasis, tumor size, ER or PR expression, and Ki67 expression. More patients with NAC achieved pathologic complete response (PCR) (85.7 vs. 58.3%, P=0.008) and the expression of COX-2 was lower in tissues of patients with PCR than in patients without PCR. In univariate and multivariate analysis, PCR, negative HER2 status, and COX-2 level were the significant prognostic factors for DFS. For OS,

PCR, negative HER2 status, and COX-2 level were also the significant prognostic factors. COX-2 expression was significantly associated with PCR and with OS. COX-2 may 82138339de
