The cities of New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago, Washington DC and many others are known to be good for business startups, thanks to their talented entrepreneurs, strong connections and a start-up infrastructure that is favorable for a business and lucrative for the owners. But is this really true? In the world of business and in the real life, people sometimes tend to believe things are a lot easier in one place than in another. This doesn't mean that bigger cities have higher revenues, as bigger cities have more talented entrepreneurs, more business owners, and more money invested in business startups. However, bigger cities have even more competition and, as a result, higher business costs. Did you know, for instance, that a business consultant or an attorney in a small town will be as qualified as a business consultant or attorney in a bigger city? They can be as talented, but they will also be compensated less, and with a better chance of not finding a job. In a smaller place, the competition for a job will be higher. In a bigger place, the competition for a job is lower. This makes sense.

You have better chances of finding a job in a place where there

Passive water addition improves performance of the chemostat in an amino acid based stressed culture of Saccharomyces cerevisiae. Cells of Saccharomyces cerevisiae were challenged with 100 mM L-histidine as a first-line amino acid (LAA) stress, and the chemostat was implemented to simulate the in-host environment, with the aim of identifying the optimum conditions for a fed-batch bioprocess with a subsequent wash step. Optimal conditions were identified based on the cell viability and the specific production rates of ethanol. The inclusion of a final water addition (150 ml/L), just after a pH transition, produced a reduced cumulative cell loss, whereas an increase in the LAA stress amplitude was detrimental to the cell viability. The final pH was slightly above the physiological value, and consequently remained neutral, as pH drops often induce a stress response in yeast, leading to cell survival and productivity under stress conditions. The addition of water at the end of the chemostat runs resulted in a higher biomass and acetate yield compared to the washout experiments. Moreover, the ammonia production was reduced by about 56%, which is the main cause of the rise of the final pH. The results indicated that, in the presence of excess LAA, the cell activity can be increased by increasing the ammonia recovery rate of the fermentation broth; at the same time the cell survival is improved by maintaining the pH lower than the physiological value. This study suggests that further investigations on the relationship between ammonia recovery and ethanol productivity should be carried out in order to optimize the process conditions that take into account the

The alpha isoform of JNK is the dominant form in most human cancers, and it is frequently found to be overexpressed and active. JNK is also an oncoprotein. Current drugs targeting kinases are generally not selective for individual members of a kinase family. Thus, the therapeutic potential of dual-targeting JNK inhibition in cancer is a real possibility. However, progress in elucidating the precise functions of JNK isoforms has been hampered by the absence of isoform-specific inhibitors. Therefore, in Aim 1, we will develop isoform-selective inhibitors by use of our discovery platform of peptide aptamers. In Aim 2, we will determine the tumor- selective tumor microenvironment (TME) effects of this class of molecules, guided by a Phage Display-based screening strategy. In Aim 3, we will validate the most promising agents in vitro and in vivo in human tumor cell and tumor models. Overall, this proposal will provide the first optimized library of JNK isoform-selective peptide aptamers with therapeutic potential. Our successful program in peptide aptamer development and validation will help to establish peptide aptamer technology as a novel and effective approach for kinome drug development.
