FreeMotionAnalysis 4.90 download link: FreeMotionAnalysis installation: Download.. Motion Analysis Motion analysis is the process of measuring and quantifying human or animal motion. The field of motion analysis is widely applicable to many aspects of computer vision and robotics. Typical examples include measurement of hand gestures in biometric applications, analysis of foot motion for gait analysis, and measurement of human movement in gait analysis. Purpose The purpose of motion analysis is to create movement models. Analysing motion allows us to quantify how motion changes over time against some reference point, it gives information of differences in directions and speed. Analyzing movements and identifying differences is not only important for technological applications but also in medical imaging, sports, and psychology. In robotics, motion analysis, among other reasons, can be used to analyse a walking robot's motion or detection of a player's movements during sporting events. Common methods Physical methods The physical methods collect the position of a body at various moments in time. It is a 3D model but it only uses two dimensions: the X and Y axis. The Z axis of a 3D model is invisible. Some tracking devices can measure and collect the position of a body in 3D (depth). However, the measurements are only available as far back as the device has been used. Time-of-flight camera A time-of-flight camera measures the time that it takes light to travel from the emitter to the detector. A time of flight can measure distances up to 25 meters away. This method is efficient if the system is light-weight and if movement is limited. This method is used for 3D modeling in manufacturing. The problem with this method is that it is able to measure only a distance of 25 meters at a time. Infrared camera An infrared camera uses the infrared radiation, a form of radiation that only travels about two meters
