From My Writing. "For more than sixty years, I have been following the ceaseless call of the Other. My doctoral thesis was a gong-song of the Other's cry out of slavery and the Other's call for freedom. In doing so, I grew up. I laid upon my dreams the guilt of my story, of having witnessed this scream from my crib. "I have always lived the Other's cry: I have always tried to identify that undercurrent, which echoes within all of us. I believe I am a subject of the cry of the Other. I struggle against the Others only to become others." "From my writing comes the cry of the Other. From your narration of our story, comes the cry of the Other. Whether we have lived it or not, we are all Other. As the Other, we are all of the same blood. We are creatures of that cry of the Other. What I am trying to do is not to be different from this cry." Conversely, "a person who is a party to an agreement in which one of the parties is a trustee may have an interest in the resolution of the merits of the case because the agreement was made for the benefit of the estate." Id. {24} We agree with Mr. Murray's application of the Crick test for the case before us. Although "indispensable[.]" Mr. Murray's interest in this case is in ensuring that his former client receives access to attorney-client documents. See id. at 1192. This is not the kind of interest that the attorney-client privilege is designed to protect from discovery. The attorney-client privilege does not insulate sensitive business documents from discovery as a matter of law, but rather places the question of the disclosure of such documents within the discretion of the court. See Security Bank, 827 P.2d at 225 (indicating that the attorney-client privilege is not absolute and that the court may consider, among other things, the "interests of the client and the attorney and the attorney's intention in making the communication◆
