Your command and control center is the ultimate secret weapon for any military or other security force. It gives you all the information that you need without requiring you to look through stacks of paper, log files or the proverbial "clutter of cables." It provides you with the information you need in one place, at the speed you need it. You need it to know where your supply lines are, which weapons are loaded, which gadgets are ready for use and what the enemy is doing. You need it to know who to contact and when, and how to dispatch your teams with full accountability and hit rates that are better than 95%. But a command center is not something you can build to order out of the blue. It takes planning and coordination to get to an effective level. And it takes training to build the knowledge base that makes up an effective center. In the course of my research I found a framework and a method for doing all of these things, and it works. My name is Woody Schuerman. I'm a retired Army Lt. Col. who came up with this framework after 20 years of leading and training combat operations teams and managing a multi-agency crisis management operation during the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001. The result of that project was the Command Center methodology, the first published and patentable process for building a fighting force. Subsequent analysis of that methodology and research on the theory of leadership and
