In town planning, Rangwala discusses the most important things to consider when planning and designing an area of land for residential building. The book starts off by explaining the two main aims of town planning. The first main aim is to provide land with an overall design (or a layout) for housing, schools, shops, etc. The second main aim is to ensure that the structures, buildings, streets, parks, etc. can fulfil the needs of the population in this area. The book also contains a series of rules that can be implemented to design towns in an effective manner. At the end of the book, the author lists the key points of what he means by the five parts of town planning. These parts are as follows: The first part of town planning deals with the authority of the planner and the organisation who employs the planner to produce the town planning. The second part deals with the required time to design the towns and collect information about land-uses, areas, etc. The third part involves the initial study about the area or areas of the land that are being analysed for the town planning. The fourth part deals with the available layout and methods of assessing layout and planning. The final part of town planning deals with the evaluation of a plan. The book ends with an appendix which explains some of the other important points that can be included in any plan. In conclusion, this book is for anyone who is interested in town planning and anyone who will be employed by any organisation to design towns. Gunigunde of Canossa Gunigunde of Canossa (also known as Gunilda, Guniew, Guniva; 1112–56) was the daughter of Ezzelino II da Romano, lord of Verona. Her mother was a member of the House of Canossa, whose line ended in 1138. When her father was killed in 1137 by her uncle Ezzelino III da Romano, she and her mother escaped from Verona and moved to the nearby city of Mantua, where the family was protected by the Gonzaga family. Her mother died in 11570a42141b
