In practice, we have carried out simulations with $\omega=1.5$, which is the value of ω required for $\sqrt{\langle \Delta A^2 \rangle}=1$. Figures (a) and (b) show the rescaled mean square transverse displacement of a trapped particle in a nearly symmetric slab in the cases of a rigid interface or an adiabatic surface, respectively. A log-normal distribution is shown to fit the numerical results well for both cases. The ratio of the Gaussian width to the mean square root of the displacement is 1.34 for the rigid interface and 0.80 for the adiabatic surface. As shown in Fig. (c), the distribution of the distance from a rigid interface to its nearest neighbor is well approximated by a Gaussian distribution, and the coefficient of determination (α) is 0.9996, which is better than 0.9999 for the case of the adiabatic surface. The distribution of the distance to the nearest neighbor is well fitted by a Gaussian distribution for both cases. The coefficient of determination (α) is 0.9999 for the rigid interface and 0.9991 for the adiabatic surface.
