I already have my own domain name and the people from google are building a new version of my site, so it will be deployed on their app engine. So is it better for my customers/users to just take the new url and use it and save time? or should I still promote and advertise the new domain name and it will be used eventually after a few months?

I can see that having a subdomain will help SEO. So what is the advantage of using my current domain? Thanks for the help. A: Can it be used more often? Not really. Aside from what you mentioned, here are some more: If you aren't going to be doing any maintenance on the domain, why should they use it? If the domain name is known, then it'll get more traffic If the domain name has SEO value (as is supposed to) then users will see your main domain in the search results If you're expecting the domain to get more traffic or be a better SEO value than the current domain, then why not use it now and set expectations accordingly? Reasons not to do it: If they are going to be running it themselves then there is no reason to do it. It's somewhat of a hassle

Physical maps of the human and chimpanzee rhodopsin genes on chromosome 10. The human and chimpanzee rhodopsin genes (RHO) have been cloned and mapped by restriction enzyme analysis to 10q21.3 in both species. Several restriction fragments and the gene itself (Rho) are conserved between man and chimpanzee. One restriction fragment is conserved only in the human, indicating that it corresponds to a human-specific insertion. A second restriction fragment is longer in human, suggesting that it may be expanded by an interchromosomal inversion in man, or that it corresponds to more distant homology. These and other recombinant maps of the RHO genes are discussed with respect to the recently described linkage of the beta 2- and beta 4-globins in 10q23-24
