I know people often try to classify functional programming in terms of static and dynamic types, currying, composing and so on. But a question came to my mind: How do you define a functional programming method? For example, I have a database of people. I want to query all the people where age is > 50. I could write: public List findPeopleByAge(int age) { List people = new ArrayList(); for (Person p : database.findAllPeople()) { if (p.getAge() > 50) { people.add(p); } } return people; } or I could do this: public List findPeopleByAge(int age) { List people = new ArrayList(); people.add(database.findAllPeople().filter(p -> p.getAge() > 50)); return people; } The first version feels much like imperative programming, the second version feels much like functional programming. My question is: Is there any difference between these two versions? Will there be any benefits of one over the other? A: The first method is an imperative approach, but it may seem like imperative programming because you are accessing a "database" that returns a "list", you are looping over the results, and you are doing some filtering. The second
