Magics Quest: TCG is a card game invented by Yuichiro Yama who later developed it into a videogame. The card game is based on a world called "Wakfu". In Magic Quest: TCG you are trapped in the world of "Wakfu" and to escape you must brave through dungeons, defeat enemies, acquire new equipment, practice skills, and combine magic items. With hundreds of weapons, equipment, magic spells, and other items, there is a ton of ways to customize your character. If you get good enough you may even be able to unlock the Wonder Mode, in which you can practice all the abilities you are skilled in. Something to note is that Magic Quest: TCG can be enjoyed by children, teens, and adults. I know of quite a few people that enjoy the card game and it is nice to see a gamer take the time to make something like this. Unfortunately it will never be 100% perfect, but Magic Quest: TCG is definitely a fun experience for all. What's new in Admiral Swiggins - Awesomenauts Character:

2.0 Beta That's right, today we're bringing you update number two to VBM2, and that's all about adding functionality. This time round we're doing our first major overhaul of the data structure since the game went public with the beta in December. As a result of this data shift you'll find that you'll notice a few slight changes to both unit information and battle maps, and when you start making use of the new features you'll also notice some other changes. The biggest shift is that you'll notice the unit table in the battle maps are now shown as rows representing countries, rather than columns representing continents. This change was implemented in order to allow consistent and easy player access to both the states of the USA and the entire world under the banner of one window. We've also gone ahead and implemented a new system of fonts and colors at the unit level, as well as allowed you to assign different colors to friendly and hostile units, this was previously a feature you could utilise in the 2.0 Beta, but didn't show up until you flipped a game over to Edit Mode at the unit level. This means that your friendly leader is now seen green and your foe is seen red, and in Edit Mode the text overlays are no longer duplicated. Overall the results are much improved and cleaner, and best of all you can view all these aspects live (or 'dynamic' if you want to get geeky) at once. The interface is still a work in progress and isn't as polished as it will be in version 2.0, but it's playable now, allowing you to do what you want to with the game for the first time. As mentioned you'll also find that the default UI now reflects the new unit colours, but all of the other tabs are unchanged. Give these in-game previews a click or two and see how they'll look in just a minute. It also means that you can easily get a feel for how your new spells or heroes will look on the battlefield without having to flip a battle map up in Edit Mode. Finally in terms of spell rollout, I mentioned last month I'd be doing some sweeping changes to where people can create master spells and custom spells and I'm happy to say I've implemented a new system that
