It is shown that under certain conditions of preoptic and hypothalamic regulation, on the 1st day after the training of rats in a battery of behavioral tests, the number of secretory neurones whose responses are excited by stimulation of the afferent pathway to the paraventricular hypothalamic nucleus are decreased and those which are excited by afferent stimulation of the diencephalic and ependymal pathways are increased in the lateral paraventricular nucleus of the ventral posterior medial nucleus. The electrophysiological responses of neurones to nerve stimulation in freely-moving animals in the morning of the 3rd day after the training have become similar to the responses of these cells in control rats and are not modified. This fact indicates that the responses of neurones of the lateral paraventricular nucleus are not involved in the organization of the functional state of the organism and the organism can resume normal functioning after a stress reaction.
