It seems to be connecting to wrong host I am using a docker-compose setup to spin up my Postgres instance. But whenever I try to query information on how much memory is reserved for the database, I get an error about it trying to connect to 10.0.3.2:5001 while the ports listed in the pg_hba.conf clearly show that the server is located at 10.0.3.3. I have added the port to allow client connections in the pg_hba.conf, to no avail. sqlalchemy.engine.base.Engine objects can be used to interact with the server, but the information it returns from SHOW pool_n_bytes is just 9.0G bytes (not the 3.7G I'm expecting). And as part of the fun and nutrition comes in with the addition of kudzu to my pantry, this is one of those recipes to try. Some days the picture at left does not look so appealing, but I wouldn't have it any other way. There is nothing I enjoy more than getting in the kitchen to make homemade gifts and help my family see that nutrition comes first in my kitchen. In the meal below, I decided to make a take on a "chicken korma" recipe by using canned ketchup, using less than half the amount of the recipe, and kudzu powder. The kudzu works as a bind that the spices and the spices adhere to and are then reheated with the chicken in the oven, allowing for a flavor explosion with the spices, the kudzu powder, and the ketchup. For the ketchup, I can't say that it's something I would ever use every day, but there are times when a creamy or thick ketchup taste is something that the family enjoys. With a few ingredients, some of my favorite spices, and kudzu, homemade ketchup is one that my family would definitely enjoy and is something to think about trying out in the future. I do have a confession to make. I don't normally eat chicken, and when I do, it's usually pork. However, if

AND OTHER STORIES BY GAY THOMAS STEYER by GUY KANE 1933 Star-Quest Books, Inc. 1 The war reached my land at sunrise, while I was still asleep. I saw it briefly in the lightening: a dark wall of British bombers passing over the eastern horizon. The Fuehrer's own island troops were sure it would be short-lived, running up against the island's three weakly defended but far more difficult landing ground. But last night, inexplicably, Hitler's bombers had flown low over the broken ground of my home's southern island—in order to leave charred and broken houses, traffic jams and smoke everywhere. The consequence of their visit was that today I was able to listen to the early morning radio broadcasts! * * * Only an uncivilized, filthy host could smile over an announcement of the arrival of a British naval task force just two months before Christmas. The Luftwaffe should fly smaller, more elegant bombers, nothing like "these wretched grey monsters," he smirked. * * * Things began to happen fast. The first plane passed over. The one after that. The land with its sleepy farmlands was suddenly empty, full of cold air, and was speckled by shadows; as the planes began to pass over, voices became audible. The farmlands were dying. There would be stragglng shots, and wounded, men running, and one lone shot, the series of bounding shoe-steps—too fast. They would probably miss the farmer, not now, not as he'd lay in the flat and dead sea, with dogs circling him. Instead came the craters, and the small pits of ruins into which the farmers had long ago placed their sturdier roots. Nothing remained—of house, lawn, or trees. Some of the windows had been broken only at the peak of the blast. Curdled bodies, bruised walls stayed upright against the sky, which ceased to be blue but looked, as if dust were slowly settling from the sky. The bombers crossed without warning, slow. They seemed to circle, ragged; more and more took the opportunity to drop their bombs, one by one, and in each crater the thunder of their explosions was audible. Suddenly, there they were: three more camouflaged ships of the Royal navy bearing a white cross on the side. Now the bombs smashed and the
