It was reported that oral health and dental conditions are more favorable among the higher socioeconomic groups than among the lower ones. The aim of this study was to explore further which socioeconomic and socio-economic-related factors influence young adults' oral health status in Greece. All students from the Universities in Thessaloniki and Athens who took part in the study were included in the study. Data were obtained from an oral health self-evaluation questionnaire, which included items regarding general dental health, oral hygiene and use of dental services. The survey was conducted by 21 dental students and two dental assistants. A total of 1096 questionnaires were completed and returned (return rate: 68.6%). The relationship between oral health and various socio-economic indicators was explored and revealed that most of the participants belonged to medium or high levels of the parental level 0cc13bf012
