[edit] The story behind Iron Sea

[edit] One day I was doing my homework and I had this idea to write a Game.[edit] Suddenly I started to work on the game and soon had so much enjoyed the first results that the tone and length of the project got out of hand. But I wasn't finished with the script, so I thought I could use this escapade to test my talent in gaming. Little expected I would be able to reach the goal I had set for myself.[edit]

On October 2008 I did have the idea to open up the issue of a

--GAME OVERVIEW The game is broken up into eight chapters. The first two chapters set the foundation of the story and introduce the characters. The chapters in between are stand alone chapters. --Chapter 1 Upon entering the room, the game begins and the main character wakes up for the day, and as time proceeds, we discover the strange life of Elsa. In the next chapter, we discover why she was fired from her job (when she was at her job she did not play hard to get with the boys). As Elsa woke up, she was in her house, so we assume her house is a dream or some sort of fantasy. As she starts her day, she notices a carnival outside and when she tries to enter it, she is stopped by a group of men in costume (of course there are jokes about this). They tell her she is "Not welcome here" so she goes to work. As she enters the front office, the receptionist is shouting into her phone and if you can see her, she has a perm. --Chapter 2 As we enter the office, the owner, Mr.Vanderwell, tells us he is sick. He is lonely and he has nothing to do, so he invites Elsa to be a part of his plan. After a couple of weeks, Elsa realizes that Mr.Vanderwell is not making her the assistant she knew and he is not very smart. At night he tells Elsa stories about his life, and as she leaves his office, she notices a red box on her way out. During the night, she is awakened by a message on her phone. In the morning, Elsa finds a message on her phone, "You left your keys on the counter. Thats me!" This voice sounds suspiciously familiar, but Elsa denies she know who it is. --Chapter 3 Elsa's next job is a summer camp for troubled teens, and as the summer progresses, Elsa encounters several stories of teenage angst. During the day, Elsa realizes her co-worker, Mike, is really crazy and also a little weird. At night, she has a dream about her brother, and the next morning she knows Mike is all confused about her dreams. --Chapter 4 One night, Elsa gets a message on her phone "You're in the weather bureau. Gotta say hi" Elsa says she is taking a smoke break at her workstation. She finds a weather map and she answers a phone call from the V.P. of the weather service

What's new in Color Chaos:

The expansion pack is set to cause multiple chain splits in the already fractured SPIKE video game community. First off, as is already known, there will be three new SPIKE items coming up in the video game market by 2008: Spike Modders (complete with mules and difficult-to-disassemble PVC tubing), Spike Storage (a gender-less storage cart the size of a dog box) and Spike Scratch (a small, portable, tool), as well as a new somewhat cult-like viral product in the form of the Spike Workshop. To help you figure out exactly who to beat down about how stupid this expansion pack is, here is a small guide to the seemingly unexplainable contradictions and mind boggling inconsistencies in this expansion pack. The Spike Workshop is the "Back to the Future" of MSI Tape Deck Adapters. It's an extremely large and elaborate workshop that has a big cutting board where you can place your "scrap", a dovetailed liquid metal clamp with which to make your "gear", and a not-quite-there "sticky dirt" arc machine that looks like it was plucked straight out of "Back to the Future II". So why are they naming it after a real-life boob tube? In addition to all this, in the workshop is a very impressive .50 caliber Magnum rifle, one of those beastly water-cooled bolt-action that's always been on every one's, a palm-like genie from the "Tron" franchise, and a richly detailed spray-can that's clearly labelled "DRI 40921". Bottom line: the workshop looks just like some schizo Lombardian artist stole it from "Back to the Future II" and turned it into an homage to Michael Bay. Are these weirdo MSI "gamers" clinically insane? Glitching in your Video Game? You'd have better luck if you got a blood transfusion from the President. These eBay sellers have the common decency to repackage their original product in its own bag and label it the "Original Evil Flame", "Explosion Dinobox" or the "Evil Flame '92". When I first saw the "clever" idea of this item, all I wanted to do was start painting it gold and spray-paint the backside with swastikas. It really starts to hit its pinnacle in the Space Lord Graphical Workstation (worth $20,000)

Fast Detect is a unique experimental story about the game's characters and their environment, told by the player through the eyes of a protagonist who is controlling their actions. The player's role in the game is to help the hero make a journey to the distant and mysterious zone while, following the story, helping him with the gathering of the necessary data for future research. During the game the player will understand why the characters of Half-Life 2 are obsessed with this zone in the river delta, and follow them to fight strange forces. The game requires player's continuous contribution and, according to the plot, the player's help is the key factor in the decisions of the characters in the game. Controls The game contains unique experimentation system, very different from the usual walking system. The player's character (represented by a small paper figure standing on the top of a character card) is moving in a vague way, experiencing physics of the environment, and the player moves the character by clicking on various locations on a board, placed on the computer screen. This game is set for a normal human to be able to play, so the character is very lightweight and it can be easily thrown away once you have played it. Gameplay The game contains some elements of board games and tower defense. A lot of people are alarmed at the prospect of President-elect Donald Trump's proposed 45% Mexico tariff on imported goods from Mexico -- 55% total on Mexican imports. While I think it's a stupid idea, there are reasons to worry about it. The reason I think Trump's tariff is a stupid idea is simple: it fails to recognize (a) America has free trade with Mexico and is not in a trade war with Mexico, (b) Mexico is turning out to be the perfect place to invest, because of America's trade gap, (c) the tariff is illogical, stupid, and doomed to fail because of very basic economic theory, and (d) because the Mexican side of the Mexican-American border with the United States is not a wall or a fence, but a free flow of people and ideas -- and other people and ideas. Stupid idea A tariff is an import tax. A customer doesn't need a tariff to pay less for a product. It can buy a product for less on the open market. People or companies can make the decision to reduce prices by selling more. Tariffs induce lower supply and higher prices. They are stupid, since they make it more expensive to buy something. A tariff is only a bad idea if it's on a good product. It is then the sort of thing President-elect Trump, and people of his mindset, might think they have a reason to do. A tariff on imported cars from Japan works better than a tariff on all imports, since cars are used and people want to use car. Even a tariff on all bad skin care products might work -- since people dislike those products. Unfortunately for the United States, the American side of the Mexican border is more a nuisance for the United States than it is a barrier to trade. At the border, people go across freely, with the United States having border guards -- active soldiers -- come to the border to keep out people and things that aren't supposed to be coming into America. Consider the ideal neighbors "If they stuck to their trade surplus with China", by Adam Larsson. The real problem with the
