The fast dissociation of a clathrin/AP180-derived domain fragment from the membrane-bound neuroendocrine protein AP180. The 220-amino acid carboxyl-terminal fragment of AP180 (M(r), 24,500) contains a region which is analogous to the yeast coat protein alpha-adaptin and one which is similar to the bacterial coat protein clathrin. In the present study, the fragment was placed on the plasma membrane of neuroendocrine cells and its properties were examined by pulse-chase experiments. The addition of this polypeptide to cells, labelled with antibodies against the clathrin light chain, resulted in the co-localization of the two proteins within the membrane fraction. Quantitative analyses showed a rapid dissociation of the fragment from the membrane when chase periods of up to 12 min were employed. Pulse-chase experiments could not demonstrate association of the fragment with other proteins of the coated vesicle membranes. These results suggest that the fragment is not stably associated with the plasma membrane but rather is a rapidly moving component of this system. When the fragment was removed from the cells by incubation in mild detergent, the fragment was found to form a complex with Na, K-ATPase. This complex dissociated when the cells were treated with sodium dodecyl sulphate. Analysis of the complex by radioimmunoprecipitation and Western blotting showed that the two proteins were specifically associated. These results are discussed in the light of possible functional roles for the fragment in membrane fusion and vesicular transport.
