Barbara Buckley has the support of a large, newly-formed, nonprofit coalition of small farmers to push for an amendment to the state's public lands management law that would allow them to use a portion of their conservation easements to pay for grazing rights on public lands. The coalition, consisting of the California Farm Bureau Federation, California Cattlemen's Association, Natural Resources Defense Council, Idaho Farm Bureau Federation, Southwest Environmental Center, Southern California Farm Bureau Federation and Association of California Water Agencies, is working with Buckley, chairwoman of the state Natural Resources Agency, in lobbying the legislative session that begins in January for the new amendment to the state's public lands management law. Buckley met with the coalition Feb. 2 in Sacramento for what she described as a "very productive" conversation with Will Brown, the director of the state Natural Resources Agency. Although the full amendment to the agency's public lands management law is not scheduled to be introduced until this summer, she noted it would pass in the Legislature should it be advanced by the public lands committee. The amendment would allow small farmers to place conservation easements on state land in return for paying for grazing rights. State
