ABOUT HOUSERUNER A large group of real-world gamers has formed, aiming to bring a massive game of action RPG challenges to both Japan and North America. As the creator of the original, acclaimed game "RuneScape", Peter Molyneux, began developing the new game, he gathered together a large group of players who would be the core of the development team. Together, they created a large open world fantasy world, made possible by the new technology. Rounding out the team includes "Mori no Mi", the world-renowned Japanese voice actors of the game. They've been working their magic to bring the game to life using their expertly synchronized actions and phrases. While you might recognize some names from "RuneScape" or other games of Molyneux, this game is entirely new. Also, there is no existing link to "RuneScape" that would continue into this project. Q: Tensorflow get all the state of GPU I am planning to run different operations at any time, so I need the list of the state of GPU. I used tf.train.start_queue_runners() to start the train. But I don't know how to get the data from GPU. The state I need include values allocated to the GPU, the rest are status in the GPU. Is there any official documentation can help me? A: The official documentation for Tensorflow GPU operations (already provides enough information. To get a complete list of the allocation of memory for tensors on your CPU host you can type tf.function() to start a training job, and then you can retrieve the variables as they have been created or deallocated, among other operations. In particular, you can inspect the values of the variables using the torch.Tensor.numpy() or the torch.IntTensor.numpy() methods. Those methods store the values of those variables as NumPy arrays: import torch import tensorflow as tf class MyJob(tf.train.TrainingJob): def __init__(self): super(MyJob, self).__init__() self.job_type = "My Job" self
