What's new:

 Island When Dr. Lawrence Henderson stepped out of his 12th floor office, it was to reveal a New York City in the worst state of decay. For years, huge piles of mud had been engulfing parts of the city as much as 30 feet. The scourge on the famous skyscraper terraces lying before his eyes was apparently, a result of a massive natural disaster that had hit the Big Apple in the first place. The massive cracks-matte with a certain sort of smother of rotting soggy mud-layered skyscrapers like so many Manhattan mole traps, snarling away at the dejection in the infected city. And the scientist knew it couldn't be brushed aside or taken lightly. Meeting up with a friend, a detective of the local police department, he suggested the two not leave the New York city in their current state. "We have to get out of here immediately," said the scientist's friend. "The city is on the verge of collapse, and every minute counts. We only have two options that I can think of: either the police department can put a perimeter around the city until it feels safe for people to return, or... Our Scientist's friend drawled. The second police detective pursed his lips. He looked to be a profoundly worried man, but he also expressed the split personality of the force: There was no clear manager. The scientist's friend took a step back as the other detective stood up. "What would you suggest, Mr. Henderson?" The other detective said. "People will be reduced to mere animal survival level if no action is taken." His companion let out a huge sigh before he thought a moment, "Understood. We have no other option but to help the police-man to beat the immediate troubles of the city. On that note, let us take a ride to an isolated hangar." The two men whose names happened to be Larry Henderson and Toby Stevens, found themselves on the 12th floor of the building. They walked to a corridor that was kept ready for emergency cases. The door was already lettered OPEN, to indicate that it required access. Inside the crowded hall there was a pile of muddy clothes that some males were wearing. With a lifeless sense of presence, the two men ignored the issue and walked out to a balcony. The pair travelled to and beyond the rear of the city to the secluded hangar.
