There are many sophisticated details to it, but it basically creates a virtual player, which moves realistically to match their actions. It also allows for a greater variety of movements. There is no longer an option to toggle the decision-making AI when not in possession—and that includes making risky passes. If you want them to be risky, the other team will be more determined to win the ball back, so they will make more risky passes and play more in close proximity to goal-scoring opportunities. There is a physical pass option, which, as per FIFA 19, is modified to match the player's physical abilities; meaning older players will get a better read on their passes. You can also now pass into off-the-ball zones as well as off-ball, meaning if a defender makes a more robust challenge, your pass will be better shaped and more accurate. This also extends to goals. We've taken it to a new level, and the game will now do a pass to a target that is outside of the penalty area, but is very close to the goal's edge; if the attacker touches the ball before it enters the goal, a pass to that exact point would be a goal. We've never been able to execute the rule of 72, but thanks to FIFA 22, we will now be able to. It's a rule that sets the number of games an athlete needs to play in order to achieve 72% of the maximum they could be capable of. If you know the rule of 72, and a player has 1 goal, a hat-trick is 3 goals. Now you can get that hat-trick in FIFA, regardless of the type of player you are. FIFA 22 is a story-driven season. It's a premier league, a Grand Prix season, and an all-star team as well. Every single league, and play style, has its own unique story; a story that goes deep into the season and its coaching staff, players, and their management. Every season we explore the trials and tribulations of what happens on the pitch, off the pitch, and within the dressing room. We take you deep into the characters of the clubs in a story that goes all the way to the end of the season, and you won't be able to avoid it. We will also be experimenting with ways to play the game on different devices. What that means is that you
