What's new:

The Cross of Auria, also known as the Chignon of Cluny, was a medieval pilgrimage site that in the Middle Ages was a famous pilgrimage site, especially before being buried under a 14th-century church. The pilgrims flocked to the site for the miracles performed by the Blessed Virgin Mary on the cross, described as resting on the skull of John the Baptist. In 1184, a Benedictine monk attempted to save the cross and successfully removed it from the church during the 1184 Siege of Fréteval. The cross was then taken to the chapel of Janau Bicard, Abbot of Cluny Abbey, where it was translated to Cluny Abbey by Bishop Radulf of Soissons. Cluny had the right to determine what was associated with the saint, but to wear the cross was more associated with the Virgin as the biblical model of one believer being given the form of the other believer. The story of the cross was moved during the thirteenth century to become part of the story of the virgin's crown. Legend According to the legend, one of the Belvedere Prophets was leaving on a journey, and as he was crossing the river Auria, the Virgin Mary appeared in a miraculous vision, and asked the prophet to place the holy lance into the sheath of the sword he was carrying. The prophet reverently hid the lance in his clothing, but by the time of his return home across Europe the lance had transformed into a cross.
