The Girl from the North Country is a timeless tale of a Western woman who leaves her first husband to run off with the next. The classic, Nora Roberts' novels are among my favorites. As with most of my favorite books, most of my favorite stories are about women. Roberts herself takes pains to point out that Nora Roberts' thrillers are women's fiction, but that fact is easier to overlook with a book like The Gift of the Guardians. Here we have a standout example of women writing a solid novel set in a male-dominated world. The Gift of the Guardians is the story of a family business that struggles on for generations. While it's a fairly typical historical drama (the main characters hail from the 19th century), the premise is also surprisingly unique. Tom Stewart, a man residing in the present day, inherits this family business and must keep it going while dealing with modern issues. The story's central conflict comes from the fact that Tom Stewart is the same age as his late wife, who suddenly dies. He has no children of his own, and he becomes determined to provide a home for his late wife's cousins, an orphaned girl named Sarita and her brother, Ravi. Sarita is a surprisingly grown up young woman, and Ravi acts in what feels like an unusually childish manner for someone of his age. The juxtaposition of these two characters is interesting, and Sarita's internal feelings around her grandmother's death and her responsibilities as the leader of the Stewart family eventually become the plot's driving force. It's a nice surprise when Roberts pays a little respect to the historical period in which The Gift of the Guardians takes place, because without that respect, it would be difficult to invest in the story at all. Here, however, Roberts does an excellent job b7e8df5c8
