The ability to predict the consequences of one's actions is critical to enable further decision making. Anticipation of potential rewards and consequences of actions relies on a brain network of value-related regions, including the orbitofrontal cortex, the insula, the striatum and the amygdala. Such reward-related brain regions have also been shown to be abnormally active in addiction. Beyond this functional role, preclinical research in our laboratory has shown that the reward-related brain regions are part of a highly interconnected network that temporally integrates all aspects of the decision making process, including preparation, action selection, and learning. Using a novel approach that integrates functional connectivity measures and computational modeling, we have recently observed that functional connections among these brain regions are abnormal in
