What's new in Human Origin:

Documentary www.traversfilms.com For anyone who didn't see The Human Origin, a missing human skeleton was discovered by the Kirishima City Police in Japan. It was apparent that this skeleton had been buried since the time of the Meiji Era, but the reasons why and when it was buried were still a mystery. Dr. Bruce MacNab from the Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis received the new samples from Japan and this is the story of how he correctly predicted the age and cause of death for this little boy. The Human Origin This little boy is the only survivor of a suicide bombing in Japan. For whatever reason, he had been caught under the rubble of the building which he had bombed. The more the rescue crews dug, the more horrific it became. It turns out that the boy was covered in burns and was left for dead. He was only digging himself out of the rubble when the medics pulled up and brought him to the hospital. His physical injuries were beyond dreadful, but luckily for him, this little boy became aware of what was being done to him and his memory remained intact. He was brought to a hospital in Kanagawa Prefecture, Japan for intensive care. When he woke up, he could only remember his name, and from that point on, his life was spent being monitored in intensive care. He was given a concoction of nutrients drip fed through a tube in his stomach, and from then on, he was kept alive. In the first few days, his condition was stable but he developed a fever. The reason for his fever? No one knew. The next week, the boy's head became too swollen for the doctors to treat without the whole surgery, his shoulders became too painful, and he could not attend school anymore. After that, the doctors became desperate because they could not prevent the boy's brain from swelling up. He, this little boy, was going to die. That was when the doctors at the hospital took the drastic measure of asking the little boy's parents if they would consider letting him die. The parents were aware that he was on the brink of death but they could not bring themselves to let their son go. They accepted. At the age of six, in April of 2016, another six weeks passed. On the eighteenth of that month, the doctors noticed that the boy's heart rate was obviously slowing down so they
