I couldn’t do a whole season with my knees the way they were. And then I said, ‘I’m not going to do this anymore. This is too hard.’ ” He sat in a folding chair in a holding cell, trying to explain that he was sick of fighting another human being over the last piece of his soul. Some inmates had said such outbursts were a sign of severe mental illness. But he felt differently. He was better than the others; he was mentally strong. The language problem was only a minor inconvenience. He said he had thought about going home and sitting in a dark corner and not seeing anyone for days, preferably until the F.B.I. led him to a prison in Germany where he would be wanted by the authorities there. But he was still too angry. “I was boiling,” he said. “I couldn’t just go home. I couldn’t kill myself.” A few days later, when the inmate thought he was safe, he called his father. He told his father what had happened, and his father begged him to go to the closest hospital, where an outpatient center was open even on holidays. The father, a longtime police officer and deputy sheriff, brought him a wheelchair and pushed him there in the rain. The director was not surprised to find inmates around the tables and the infirmary hall. They'd been watching him through the window. "They call it the 'hole,' " he said. "The prisoners refer to the personnel as 'the grave diggers.' " Some of the inmates have been institutionalized and transferred to out-of-state prisons. "They've all c9d1549cdd
