The U.S. Department of Transportation on Monday announced a voluntary recall of the 2008 Toyota Camry and 2008 Scion tC in the United States because of a potential engine cooling system failure. The 60,000 affected vehicles may suffer engine overheating, resulting in serious or fatal injuries and the death of a vehicle owner. The vehicles are equipped with a vehicle temperature sensor that relays the engine temperature to the engine control unit (ECU). Toyota said the sensor could fail and prevent the heater fan from opening and prevent the engine from cooling. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration is investigating the cases of overheating and deaths of the vehicles in the U.S. Earlier this month, the agency announced it had investigated the deaths of three people in the U.S. that were found to be linked to the problem. The temporary recall covers the 2008 Camry and 2008 tC, model years 2008-2013, manufactured from November 22, 2007, to June 15, 2014. The recall is limited to engines with the 2UZFE-B or 4UZFE-B motor. Toyota said it would install a new hardware and software component to the exhaust coolant sensor in the affected vehicles. The company said it expects to have the repairs done in two to six weeks, and there would be no financial impact to the U.S. consumer. Toyota said the exhaust coolant sensor was previously identified on two other vehicles in the U.S. but that the company managed to fix the problem without any injuries or death. The company said it expects to have all the fixes performed by April 15, 2015, and will notify owners of the vehicles to apply a software update as well.

Friday dropped its demand that would-be immigrants register with the Department of Homeland Security before they enter the country, drawing cheers from Republican conservatives who see it as a first step toward establishing a registry of Muslims. The decision was described as a victory by U.S. Speaker of the House Paul Ryan and others who believe the issue of restricting entry of immigrants based on their religion is constitutionally unsupportable. Shortly after U.S. Secretary of State Rex Tillerson dropped plans to enforce the requirement for immigrants to register in late August, Ryan, who is facing re-election next year in the House of Representatives, called it an "excellent idea." "Not only should the administration not be able to do that, it's just contrary to who we are as a country, as a notion," Ryan said in an interview with television network ABC. "We need to be, in fact, a welcoming place and not a place that's forcing people to jump through hoops and prove their religion." At a rally in North Carolina on Thursday, Trump said he was "very proud" of the administration for ending a so-called "registry" program that he had campaigned on in 2016. "We want people coming into our country to come in legally and have a system that's not so bad,"

Trump said. Opponents of such a registry have argued that it would be unconstitutional and discriminatory. Some critics of the idea have urged a replacement which does not single out specific groups. A November 2017 draft of the 2018 U.S. immigration bill proposed a list that included "documented or undocumented Muslims," according to a copy of the bill seen by Reuters. The list includes Iran, Libya, Somalia, Syria, Sudan and Yemen and had the potential to raise concerns among U.S. Muslims, who say they are subjected to unfairly harsh treatment.
