Lipoprotein lipase (LPL) is a secreted enzyme involved in the hydrolysis of triglyceride-rich lipoproteins, including chylomicrons. We have investigated the effect of LPL activity on cellular cholesterol efflux in primary adipocytes from normal, obese, and diabetic rodents. LPL had no effect on basal cholesterol efflux from adipocytes isolated from normal and obese rodents, but resulted in an increase in cholesterol efflux in isolated adipocytes from diabetic rats. Cholesterol efflux was maximally enhanced (twofold) in the presence of LPL only after treatment of the cells with the bile acid 3'-epsilon-bile acid; neither cAMP nor cGMP was involved. After cholesterol loading of the cells, the same dose of LPL resulted in a concentration-dependent increase in cellular cholesteryl ester content. A 5-fold reduction in cellular LPL activity (from a maximum of 200 to 40 mU/10(6) cells) resulted in inhibition of cholesterol efflux and a decrease in cellular cholesteryl ester content, with a maximum effect of 75-80%. We propose that inhibition of adipocyte cholesterol efflux in the presence of excess LPL results in a decrease in cellular cholesteryl
