Q: Hibernate EntityManager: Block all access to a persistent object During production testing, I would like to block all access to an existing persistent object for a given period of time. Most likely a scenario is that I have an object A with id A. For some reason, the developer has messed around with the persistent map (Hibernate uses sessions). Is there a way to temporarily block all queries to A using the EntityManager API? A: I see no way to do this with the standard EntityManager API. However, if you can't revert the entity back to what the persistence provider thinks it is, then you can use a custom Hibernate Session to give you more control over your session. Under the covers, a Session is just an EntityManagerFactory with a custom org.hibernate.SessionImpl. You can still roll back your changes to an in-memory HSQLDB database. Here's an example Session implementation from the Java 5 docs. import org.hibernate.
