Introduction Welcome to the second Sango Guardian class. In this episode we will be covering the eight masters of the Sango style of Rhythmic Martial Arts from around North America. Man, I still miss that time. Anyway, the magical podcasts that will form the majority of this episode will be part of the Chaos Generation Steamedition Zone. These shows are expensive and I hate to break it to you Huang ZhiChen fans, but they suck. Lots of people think that they're good, but they aren't. They're more gimmick than a cool concept. If you're like me and not into the Sango thing, that's okay I'm sure. Just be honest that you're not a Sango snob because I didn't always like them...and that you don't need to pay money for them. All that will be covered later in this episode. This is not a soccer brag about ability, but a knockoff of a knockoff by Morrissette. The moment Morrissette started doing this bullshit he ceased to be a viable provider of payed play music just... he became The Emperor so instead of listening to good music you spend your money

Sat, 10 Sep 2015 03:41:30 +0000>Q: Will my.NET 4.0 application compile and run (Totally) on a.NET 1.1 machine? I recently managed to coax my company into allowing the project I work on to go with.NET 2.0, but now I'm having to convince them that it would be irresponsible to force us to invest in a.NET 4.0 machine given that we still have one SP1 KVM server out the door with.NET 1.1 installed on it. These sites sit on a 2000 MHz Pentium III, but the KVM is a 2.8 GHz Xeon. Both the compiler and my application are fully capable of targeting higher.NET versions than what they are currently running, but I really feel bad saying yes when I know the error messages are going to be atrocious. Will my application, in its current state, (a) compile and run without errors and (b) will it execute as efficiently as it is now on.NET 2.0/3.5/4.0? A: Any CLR 2.0 to CLR 4.0 DLL will work fine with.Net 1.1 on any machine, except a machine with no managed code/Native code (i.e. older versions of Windows). Any language that can target 4.0 can be made to target.Net 1.1 without any changes to the language/runtime itself. A: If I understand your question correctly, then the answer is yes. No matter the version of the runtime the application is compiled under, it will still work on.Net 1.1. As long as all of your dependencies are.
