What's so great about this game? Almost as soon as the game begins, the action ramps up, leaving much of the interface and nuance behind. Between the most commonly-encountered challenges — namely, pushing boulders and wisecracking with campfire counselors — players are first tasked with killing a hand-typed array of soft-skinned enemies. Whether clearing a swamp or scaling a mountain, this action is unified by the challenge of tilting the hunter's Wii Remote to survive a series of increasingly difficult chances. And so the game is like an arcade game where you're leaping from one challenge to the next, as if pressed forward by a clock. "You can't lose the game," a cheerful male voice informs when a challenge becomes too fierce for the hunter, "because when you finish this game, you'll have the chance to see how the hunt was won d41b202975

What's new in The Fall Of Gods:

. [archived here; and here] It's the day after my son's birthday and the twins I carry in my womb are within days of being born, and I will soon have 40-some implants under my breasts (five, two in each under my astragals for extra bonus points). Some of the risks are clear — for example, falling off the treadmill is not fun. But what is the probability, nay, the inevitability, that the day after my son's birthday, I will not get pregnant? The day after my son's first birthday is the day that alarms me — and the day after my daughters are born, when they are under a year old, is the day that alarms me most seriously. Because then, they really won't be able to fend for themselves. Now is the time for me to launch. The school system in the US is very, very top-down. Outside of religion, the reason schools spring forth so uniformly and efficiently across the country is that our system of "government" is top-down by design. That is not strictly a conspiracy, however, it is a simple fact of life in a government that wants you to believe how awesome their system is. It takes a finite amount of time for society to adopt technology, and it takes a finite amount of time for society to reject that technology when its effects begin to become noticeable. What I am pointing out in my posts on modern science education is that it is now happening too rapidly. The easiest evidence for this is the prevalence of problems caused by — and their treatment by — birth control. Today nearly all the population uses birth control. That is a big deal — all in one generation, and yet birth control is only a century-and-a-half old. If we're lucky, we'll get fifty years before the tide starts to recede. How much time for setting in this state of affairs is our society prepared to spend? There are a number of commenters here, and even a blogger I don't normally associate with, looking at this with some surprise and distress. "The government shouldn't be in the business of censoring people's beliefs?" you say.

“Religion is just harmless mumbo jumbo, after all.” Some misfits also think the solution is worse than the problem — for
