What's new:

January 31, 2015 Way back in October, I published a blog post right here at “A Fire Discovery Journey” on “What it takes to move a thing through space”. In that post I explained, “It takes the use of gravity, air resistance and friction to move the sea cup and the action of air on a thing in a space (the sail). A solid and a liquid body (sea cup) are also needed.” What this really means is that in order to get a boat to go faster, you must push on and “friction” against something, usually a great mass of water. Otherwise, the “force” of wind only acting on a relatively small surface of sail creates less energy transfer than if the wind acted directly against the entire hull of the boat. Of course, there is a lot more that I have yet to discuss on how the boat is built or what drives her. The underwater propulsion systems are fascinating. Sometimes they may not need wind resistance at all. Essentially, the boat is not a self-propelled thing, in other words, it will never move of its own accord unless immersed in water. Once under water, the boat draws water in her hold and through her ballast to create an “upward force”, which is less than the downward force of gravity pulling on the boat. In other words, the boat will weigh more on the bottom than she will weigh on top, thus creating an “upward motion”. This is the propulsion system and the source of the boat’s motion. Let’s say for example, the boat is filled with water and the ballast is water, the water in the boat then becomes the action. The wind and the action together, equal the force required to move the boat forward. Since weight is the action and the water is the thing moving the boat forward, the boat becomes lighter as she moves forward. This is how she creates movement. Once the boat starts to move, she creates a force which causes the air to go against the boat, thus creating atmospheric pressure and the wind resistance. The wind resistance will cause the boat to move forward. Do you see where I am going with this? The boat drives forward to where she creates an equal and opposite force of wind over the sails. This force is great enough to drive the boat ahead. The wind resistance is often the most responsible for a
