The decrease in the total hemoglobin content of one unit of blood after transfusion and the loss of red cell antigens and blood group antigens in an appreciable number of units of blood was determined. The incidence of such phenotypic changes was associated with a high incidence of homozygous blood groups in our population. The possible relationship between lack of phenotypic expression and loss of red cell antigens was investigated by immunizing individuals against red cell antigens and subsequently transfusing red cells. The immunized group showed red cell phenotype changes. Many individuals showed no red cell phenotype change. The ability of organisms to invade or survive in the blood of persons transfused with whole blood, packed red cells, and platelets was investigated. The recovery of a large number of organisms was observed. The possible relationship between the red cell phenotypic changes observed and the transfusion of whole blood is discussed. module
