Psychologists are generally unprepared to work with battered women and their children, but are still expected to contribute to child protection and health care systems. Although the training of psychologists in working with traumatized clients is a challenge, the training of psychologists to work with children who have experienced child abuse and neglect is even more demanding. The professional responsibility of psychologists to work with abused and neglected children requires a strong orientation toward the special needs of children and the maltreatment of children. Previous work from this research group focused on the development of curriculum for a self-study program to be used by therapists in the context of their clinical practice. This article describes the development of a therapist education curriculum to assist therapists in the work with abused and neglected children. A final curriculum, "Working With Children Who Have Experienced Child Abuse and Neglect," contains seven modules: the history of victimization, child trauma and its sequelae, the child abuse and neglect presentation, victimizations with implications for the mental health of the victim, therapeutic interventions, evaluation and treatment planning, and counseling ethical decision making.
