The move is just one of many that HP is planning to pursue in Asia this year, in its attempt to take advantage of the fast-growing Chinese IT market. HP China was launched last year to help its partners in China sell to China's growing information technology market, which has become the world's second largest with 140 million people online. "We will open a new office in Japan to serve more of our customers in the region and better understand the huge opportunities that Japan is poised to offer as a major market for our IT devices," a HP spokeswoman said. The statement came after the two companies announced on Tuesday that HP's printer and copier division will unveil a new all-in-one device called the HP Sprocket. The printer is about the size of a shoebox, is installed in a compact structure with a flat area on top that can easily hold media. The spokeswoman said the office in Japan will also help inform HP of "future product innovations in China" and would help HP increase market share in that market. The office in Japan is likely to employ staff in HP's National Sales Organization (NSO) or print and ink vertical. This team is headed by VP and GM of China, NNSO, Lisa Liu. China
