Thus, one could suppose that a less stable social network is associated with changes in mood and cognitive functioning. However, in the present study, the association between social network stability and cognitive and mood functioning was found not only in patients with well-maintained social networks but also in patients with declining social networks. Thus, the predictive power of social network changes for cognitive and mood functioning is stronger when the social network is well-maintained rather than declining. The higher predictive power of ongoing social network changes for cognitive and mood functioning in patients with declining social networks rather than in patients with well-maintained social networks supports the alternative assumption that negative social network changes are more closely associated with negative mood and cognitive functioning than positive changes are. This study has several limitations. First, the cross-sectional design of the study is not suitable for causal inferences about social network changes and cognitive and mood functioning. Second, the present findings cannot be generalized to all persons with depression due to the small sample of patients with depression. Third, a change in the level of cognitive functioning could not be differentiated from a change in the level of cognitive functioning on a particular day. Thus, it is possible that our findings are a reflection of the temporal

Recording systems of the aforementioned kind are known from various publications. Thus, U.S. Pat. No. 5,247,225 discloses a method and a device for recording written, typewritten and machine-printed text by means of a digital machine, whereby a paper with a recording medium, in particular, a coated paper, is provided in the digital machine. The text or data are transferred from the digital machine to the paper by means of a transfer device. A print station is connected with the paper advance device. The paper is transported between the print station and the transfer device. In the transfer device, the digital machine is connected to the print station in order to transfer the data stored in the digital machine to the paper. The print station has a print unit, which is connected to a computer. The computer is connected to a decoding device, which is connected to a word memory. The paper advance device is connected to a decoding means. The word memory is linked to the word memory of the decoding means, so that the paper advance device can supply data to the word memory. The print station is linked to the decoding means. After the transfer of the data stored in the digital machine to the paper, the paper is transported between the print station and the transfer device, whereby the print station prints out the text, which has
