So-called "elevated" works include the use of various techniques that influence the biological and psycho-behavioural status of people engaged in their performance. However, the majority of earlier publications deal with the problem of their realization in terms of a broad definition of "physico-chemical aspects" of their performance, neglecting psychophysiological aspects of this work and this leads to errors in design of these works that may be not adequately accepted by workers. The authors discuss hygienic-psychological aspects of "elevated" works on the base of experiences gained during the implementation of "elevated" works at a building site. New powers for engineers to "prevent" fracking in the UK New rules to make it illegal for companies to frack in the UK will give engineers the power to "prevent" the practice. The Government has strengthened enforcement of the UK's current moratorium on fracking and laid out new powers for engineers to direct well drilling operations for the first time. The proposals, outlined in guidance issued this week, will make it illegal for companies to frack if the project interferes with the authority's planning function. They will also grant the planning system the power to override decisions made by companies and at the same time give contractors the right to refuse to perform work that is likely to cause loss or injury. A moratorium on fracking in the UK remains in place, with the exception of shale gas exploration and extraction projects covered by the previous industrial plans, but critics say that the new powers mean that it will eventually become illegal to drill for shale gas at all. Green campaigners have repeatedly warned that if the moratorium is lifted it will lead to a boom in the development of unconventional gas. The GMB trade union, which helped
