Three physiologically active monoamines are present in the blood of mammals, which are closely related to physiological disorders. Since they are difficult to separate by conventional methods, simultaneous determination of their plasma levels is a challenge. In this work, chitosan nanoparticles were prepared using a simple emulsion-coacervation method and used for the preparation of molecularly imprinted polymer. The nanoparticles were characterized using scanning electron microscopy, transmission electron microscopy, Fourier-transform infrared spectroscopy, and X-ray diffraction. Their relative adsorption capacity for the separation of the three monoamines from human plasma was evaluated and compared with non-imprinted polymer. The results of this study showed that the imprinted nanoparticles were much more effective in the adsorption of the three monoamines compared with the non-imprinted polymer. The maximum adsorption capacity was 84 mg/g for dopamine, 76 mg/g for epinephrine, and 61 mg/g for norepinephrine. The developed method was successfully used to detect the plasma levels of three monoamines in a human subject.
