The present invention relates generally to an apparatus and method for detecting movement of a wire, and more particularly, to an apparatus and method for detecting deflection of a wire in a flight control system of a guided weapon. It is known to use fiber optic cables as a sensing element for many different types of guided weapon systems. For example, the use of fiber optic cables is widespread in the aerospace industry for use in many different types of guidance systems, including those for aircraft, spacecraft, projectiles, and missiles. As a result of the significant military and commercial development of guided weapons in the last quarter of the twentieth century, designers have had to deal with many novel problems. For instance, guided weapons are now typically used for guidance to the targets, and projectiles may need to be fired in a variety of different manners in order to hit the target. Some c9d1549cdd

What's new in YOMOTSU:

of Jorvik_, p. 31. A London buyer made an even more outrageous claim in his publication. He said that in London the "old court records" made known that King Richard I had not died in 1199: "On the contrary, it may be proved, that he had in all probability not only been at Goodrich, on the confines of Mercia and Northumbria, but had in some degree taken his part in the bloody insurrection of Goodrich Mên, which, as may be gathered from the massy records of all England, had not yet terminated in the death of that mysterious person, called in the evidence of the Norman annalists, 'the good king, King Richard the First'—and that the death of King Richard was, in fact, consummated within forty hours of his abandonment of the White Horse!" John Richard Porson, Commentarius in T. R. Halton's Chronicles, vol. 2 (London, 1810), pp. 407-8. Ibid., pp. 409-10. Clearly, contemporary sources alone (even if to some extent they may be biased because of their authors' allegiance to one or the other side), cannot be relied upon to settle this matter conclusively. We do know that both Will de Heugdene and Philip Repese are not the only two men with that name who were alive in the late twelfth century (several other chronicles mention them), but the sixth earl was William de Heugdene II (d. ca. 1185), not his great-grandson, who died in 1207, and the former Sheriff of London, Philip Repese, is not even known by name until 1165 (vide infra, p. 230). Richard FitzRalph was sheriff in 1181-83, an election which suggests that his father's name was not Richard, though he himself later said "it was none other than Richard, my father, who... was sheriff of London" (Dugdale in Foedera II, 772). But again, Richard FitzRalph died in 1214, in all likelihood a hundred years after 1181. History is good at making up villains, but in determining which are the real villains, it is not always very good at impartially dealing with different rivals. Jones, Richard I, p. 138. The clip has an ambidextrous lever release that makes for pretty simple operation; each side is independently adjustable for either left or right handed shooting. As I said, this type of design is a thing of beauty, a real distinctive feature for an out of the box design that is about as mechanically sound as a pistol ever gets. The alloy frame provides rigidity and safety, plus the trigger guard is robust and provides exceptional ergonomics. The Model 640's grip safety provides an added measure of safety by preventing the trigger from being pulled if the firearm is still in the "up" or "cocked" position.
