The most important code is the class A subset whose only elements are enumerated in Enum. As the documentation states, they must provide an explicit constructor without parameters. It is the responsibility of the programmer to ensure that all subclasses provide it and that they are given default parameters as appropriate. The general class B subset will be represented by a class that has the exact same layout as the one used by class A. All code in this class will be overridden from A or B depending on its usage. All classes in this subset should provide a constructor without parameters, as well as constructors for instances of A and B. The general class C subset would be an inner class. Its only purpose is to provide an outer class B with an additional field. Again, the C class should provide a constructor without parameters, and the B class should provide constructors for instances of itself and its subclasses. Using subclassing is a good technique to provide flexibility in your code while ensuring strict compliance with the "write once" principle. This technique has several advantages: It allows the developer to change the implementation of class A without having to change any other class. It avoids having to make every class define and use a different constructor. It allows the developer to implement the subset classes without having to access all of the details of class A's implementation. It allows the developer to create a subclass that serves 0cc13bf012
