Getting creative with Photoshop The most visible feature in any version of Photoshop is the Image Adjustment layer. You work with it by first creating a new layer under the active layer. Then, using the Adjustments panel, you work with various sliders to create different visual effects for your image, using either masks or transparent layers. Figure 9-10 shows the Adjustments panel for Photoshop CS4. Some items in the Adjustments panel are visible only when you click the All Layers button below the image thumbnail in the Layers panel. That's where you create a new layer before adding an Adjustment layer to the new layer.

Photoshop also offers a number of Expert tools, such as the Blur and Sharpen tools, as well as the Clone Stamp tool. These tools are helpful for creating special effects with large areas of the image, adding text, or removing unwanted elements of an image.

You control the tools with a few simple, familiar controls: Sharpen tool —Increases detail in your image. You choose which part of the image to sharpen. Smooth tool —Chops off the unwanted details from an image to let its sharp edges stand out. You choose how much to smooth. Rotate tool —Rotates the image you're working on. You can choose to rotate the entire image or a selected area. Fill tool —Makes an image's background invisible. You can choose from a number of color overlays for your chosen background color, or you can use white for a transparent background. The Blur tool applies a `_Gaussian blur_` to soften colors, provide a smoother, more realistic image, or create a completely different image. © William Machtig Illustration by Jon Cook FIGURE 9-10: The Adjustments panel in Photoshop Elements CS4 is similar to the Photoshop version.

Q: CSS background-size: cover and image overflow I've been searching, but can't find a solution for my problem. I'm trying to use cover to scale an image to fill up the remaining width of the container. The problem is that because of the overflow, there is a white space between the image and the bottom of the container. I'd like the image to overflow the container. When I remove the overflow-x: hidden line from my css, the image still fills up the entire container. I've tried changing the image size using the max-height property, but that didn't seem to work. HTML: CSS: html, body { background-color: white; padding: 0; margin: 0; } #cover { width: 100%; height: 100vh; background-image: url(""); background-repeat: no-repeat; background-size: cover; background-position: center; } .container { width: 200px; height: 200px; background-color: red; } #pageImage { width: 100%; height: auto; max-width: 100%; } Fiddle: A: Set your image as a background of a pseudo element. Demo html, body { background-color: white; padding: 0; margin: 0; } #cover { width: 100%; height: 100vh; background-image: url("

Many parents look forward to being present at home while their child is eating, and spend an extraordinary amount of time preparing the food. However, most parents that I've talked to about my research about eating, and about being a parent, think that they don't spend enough time with their children. I spend two years studying the eating behaviour of parents in a large cross-sectional survey of a nationally representative community sample of two-parent families in England. The sample has almost 2,500 families, and it includes data on their eating behaviour. I studied how much time mothers and fathers spent with their children in and around mealtimes. I then used the data to study how much time each parent spent with their own children, and looked at differences in how long mothers and fathers spent with their children on weekdays and on weekends. When I surveyed the parents about being a parent, I asked them if they had any concerns about being a parent; if they thought about their child a lot, and if they felt they made the most of the time they had with their children. I also asked the parents about their family income, and about how happy they were in their family. I also asked the parents how easy it was to balance work, family and leisure, and how easy or difficult it was for them to make time to do things with their child. Not eating with you I found that, on average, mothers spent slightly more than a half-hour with their children per day. Fathers spent a little more time with their children than mothers on weekends, although on weekdays they spent slightly less time with their children. Parents in couples where one parent had a higher income spent slightly less time with their children on weekdays. Parents who had higher income spent more time on weekends. Parents who reported that they were less happy with their lives spent more time with their children on weekdays, and those who were more happy with their lives spent more time with their children on weekends. Parents spend a long time preparing food for their child The most common reported reason for not eating together with their children was a lack of time. I found that parents felt that they had a problem with time-management in relation to mealtimes. The second most common reason was that parents did not want to eat a meal with their children. This was particularly common among parents who spent more time with their children. Other common reported reasons were that the child was too young, or that they worried
