The invention is based on a water injection system for internal combustion engines as disclosed in German Patent Document DE 41 20 722 A1. In internal combustion engines, it is known to supply the cylinder with additional water through an injection line. This can reduce engine knocking in combination with a gas-exchange valve arrangement. In case of a typical six-cylinder engine, as for example a six-cylinder engine used in passenger cars, an injection line would be provided for each cylinder. The water injection can be triggered by way of a water pump which can be driven in parallel to the engine shaft in the course of an idling operation. The water injection takes place with the aid of a water injection valve which is controlled by way of a control valve which is coupled to the associated water pump and is switched on by way of the water pump. To achieve a quick start, the valve can be switched on even after the engine start. The water in the injection line can be filled by way of a water tank which is connected to the injection line. In engine knock detection, the water flow in the injection line is measured and detected by way of a control device for this line. From German Patent Document DE 186 50 709 A1, a fuel metering unit is known which is also controlled by the control device for the water injection. The reason for this is the connection of the fuel metering unit to the control device for the water injection, the control of the supply of fuel to the combustion chambers of the engine by the fuel metering unit taking place indirectly through the control device. By way of this indirect connection, it is guaranteed that the quantity of fuel to be injected remains constant, even when the control device for the water injection, which makes possible a quick start of the engine, controls the water injection as well. The fuel metering unit is controlled with the aid of a determination of the oxygen content in the exhaust gases of the engine during the idling operation. This determination is made possible by a corresponding circuit arrangement. In this context, a controllable oxygen storage unit which can be supplied with air is preferably supplied with air from
