Q: What is the most reliable way to find out if my background process is stuck? What is the most reliable way to find out if my background process is stuck? This should be generic. I have a variety of processes that potentially can end up in an infinite loop (basically - a service) Ideally I would like a mechanism that can: Tell me if the process is up or down at any given point in time. Tell me if the process is somehow damaged. Tell me if the process is stuck. Thanks A: The most reliable way is to check for the specific exception that is being thrown. There are a few reasons that a process might stay alive in an infinite loop (assuming, of course, that your service should be marked as "will not respond to requests"). Basically, a task can be stuck if: it is being terminated by code other than your code it is running in a bound-to-halt mode your code is in a blocked state and is not responding to requests If a task is running in a bound-to-halt mode, your code will kill that process. It will not, however, kill the process that is spawned forking you. The reason for this is that the code that is spawning you is recognizing that the process that is spawned is in a "deadlocked" state and being in a "deadlocked" state is not the same as actually being in an infinite loop. A deadlocked state means that the task has to be terminated in some way - perhaps it will wait for a resource to become free - so even if the parent task were to kill the process, there is a good chance that it will execute successfully. As for the second and third points, you can be certain that, if your service is stuck, it is either in a loop and you have not written code to handle the case where a process is stuck, or it is waiting for I/O to complete. If you aren't prepared to handle the first three cases, try checking the Windows e79caf774b
