"Although I was able to pull off a little bit, I still had difficulties finding various things to help boost my stats. Such as finding a certain kind of weapon, I was able to pick up whatever I found, and the stat boosts would follow. As a matter of fact, there was a weapon that only granted strength, but which I couldn't find after a certain point in my quest. So because of a lack of stats, I decided to go on a bit of a power trip with all the possible attacks I could throw. By level 2 I was able to kill everything I came across, and it was when I reached level 16 that a Dark Elf appeared. Now, the problem with Dark Elves is that they tend to be pretty damn good at aiming and also tend to be pretty fast." "The game generally has a standard formula. Your character starts off in front of a "beginning" book that teaches you how to play and gives you your first quest. As the game progresses, you are tasked with taking a series of post cards in the mail to reach a certain point. Each post card has a spot on the map and a set number of monsters to defeat. Now, you have to be careful because once you are at the spot and there is a point, you can only fight monsters. If you aren't careful, then you can use up your attack cards. And once you have run out of cards, you will have to wait for the next day to obtain new ones and once again continue your quest. The game has a good amount of variety, it isn't hard. It is easy to learn, but as you continue to play, it becomes an all out test of your resourcefulness. A well timed move, and you can dodge a tricky boss. You spend a lot of time going through instructions before you can start on the quest to become an Elden Lord." Let's dive into Fantasy Blade's new gameplay system! The following is a summary of the new actions. • Attack The primary action during battles. Attacks the enemy to defeat the enemy and improve the battle score. • Guard (Hold) When the enemy attacks, you can deflect the enemy's attack by putting the weapon in guard. During a guard, the AP available to the next attack after break is consumed. Once the guard period ends, your equipment is automatically removed. • Break Deflecting the enemy's attack with guard does not consume AP. However, in order to attack after break, you need to have weapon equipped, which drains AP. "Weapon" refers to a weapon that changes the movement speed of the character. The weapon equipped can be changed after break. • Power up When the attack score is increased during a battle, the next attack will have a stronger boost. When a power up occurs, a star appears on the character. • Special Attack When a star appears on the character's head during a battle, the movement speed boost of the character is increased. The star appears when it is charged up for a certain amount of time. * When the star appears, the next attack will have an increased boost. Special attacks are stronger and can be charged multiple times. The amount of time it takes to charge a star is determined by the amount of AP available to the attack. * When the star is charged, the amount of AP consumed for each damage dealt increases. * When a star is charged, a choice to use an ability that consumes AP is available. • Dodge Dodging means that the character instinctively does not take the attack it received. When a dodge occurs, the next attack will have a decrease in the attack boost. • Save Life When "Critical" (high score) is set, the character's defense increases. When "Critical" is on, it is possible to perform another "Save Life" during the critical period. The character's defense decreases for a short while. In addition, during a critical, the movement speed and attack speed is increased. * This can be executed even when there is no delay in time. The following action is based on actions. • Steps (Action) Steps, which change the direction of movement, are available. Steps occur when a key is pressed or when you execute an action like to try this. For "stuck" patients, it would help to understand and acknowledge their concerns. If I was in their shoes, and stuck, I would have wanted to know what they thought about the treatment they were having. I might like the explanation, but I would also want to give the treatment my full attention, without necessarily seeing it as an insurmountable problem. For a psychologist, I imagine the possible hurdles to treatment would include the patient's ambivalence about treatment, their insight into the problems they have, and others' opinions about their personality. It is common for people with borderline personality disorder to have trouble processing information about their pathology, and not always understand the need for treatment ([@B2]). In addition, these patients can show great insight into their deficits but lack the ability to act on this insight to help change their behavior ([@B2]). In some cases, the changes that are needed to meet a specific need---treatment of their borderline personality disorder, for example---can be extremely difficult and possibly futile without the added support of family or friends. This can make the patient withdraw from treatment, unless it is coupled with positive feedback from loved ones, or other professionals who have the patient's best interests in mind ([@B2]). For a patient's relatives and friends, it is important to learn the patient's needs in a realistic way, from their tone of voice to their interest in exploring personal history. Conversely, it is common for loved ones to want to minimize the severity of someone else's problems and try to "help" patients who are depressed or suicidal by helping them seem happier or suicidal or by making them suffer ([@B2]). Therefore, "family therapy" and psychopharmacology are different approaches to treating the patient. The therapist may need to explore the patient's view of family in order to assess its validity and importance. Maintaining Treatment Goals {#s8} ===== I have previously noted that clinicians can lose focus on the goal of treatment. If the clinician spends more time explaining the nature of personality disorders, for example, than actually helping the patient to change, then the clinician has failed to guide the patient toward their goals of recovery. Even in this era of abundant and readily available information, patients are sometimes unable to take in new information as it relates to their issues and tend to preserve their belief systems even when they have changed, particularly in the areas of current concerns. For example, a patient who has experienced a significant change
