The present invention relates generally to gas turbine engines, and, more specifically, to turbine blade cooling. A typical gas turbine engine includes a compressor section, a combustor section and a turbine section. Airflow entering the compressor section is compressed and delivered to the combustor section where it is mixed with fuel and ignited, creating a high temperature flow path. The flow path is then expanded through the turbine section where it is contacted by rows of stator vanes and rotor blades. The blades include airfoils arranged in stages that are sequentially arranged to cause the high temperature gas to pass through each stage of the turbine section, thereby increasing the temperature of the gas, and ultimately, the power available from the engine. Each turbine blade includes an internal cooling system that allows for extracting heat from the component during operation. An internal cooling passage is formed in the blade. One or more cooling holes are included in the internal cooling passage to allow the cooling fluid to pass therethrough and cool the internal portion of the blade. The cooling fluid is typically cooled air extracted from the compressor section. The cooling fluid exiting each blade internal cooling hole must travel to the external surface of the blade. For the blade tip, the heat transfer path is generally restricted by the trailing edge of the blade, which is conventionally used as a seal between the tip and the shroud surrounding the blade. This seal may be provided by an impingement lip that extends from the internal blade wall surface and is sealed against the wall surface of the turbine shroud. To prevent the cooling fluid from passing from the blade tip to the shroud, some blades include a tip lip. The tip lip is generally positioned between the impingement lip and the shroud and is sized such that cooling fluid cannot pass through the passage between the tip lip and the blade tip and is captured by the tip lip. Cooling fluid that travels through the passage between the tip lip and the blade tip must still travel through the airfoil portion of the blade, which includes both the external airfoil wall surface and the internal wall surface. Generally, the internal wall surface is used to direct cooling fluid from the passage into the airfoil and the external wall surface is used to direct the cooling fluid out of the blade. The blade tip in known gas turbine engines generally includes a slot extending from the trailing edge of the blade tip to the trailing edge of the tip lip. The slot provides access for cooling air to enter the passage between the tip lip and the blade tip. The slot is generally
