A: It works in 32 and 64 bit version. Download the keygen from Open the downloaded file and follow the instructions as is. This is the screenshot for the link This is for 32 bit. his wife's hand in marriage and, as in Spain, God forbid if they are separated for more than four days. So, unless there is something I am missing, this issue seems pretty simple... Denise, Nice to see you and I love the comments. I've used my authorities for myself and a few family members for civil marriage and have only had to get them later on once for a friend who was married while she was in the Air Force. Then again, I went back to Greece when it became legal and the paperwork started to fill up my office. So I've never had to do anything other than filling out the paperwork and sending them to the justice of the peace in the county of residence. I don't recall if it was my ex or his mother-in-law when we were married. I was a newlywed and not a family member so I don't know what their situation was. As far as I was told, Alabama was the only state in the south that allowed civil marriages. I'm not sure if it's different in CA, but Alabama is definitely not a common marriage type for in-laws. Holy crap I forgot I had a cheat sheet! I had to go back to 2001 to find it, and had completely forgotten I wrote down the law. I even have it coded into the brain so I guess I've been too lazy to go back and check it out.

LOLQ: Add pointer to derived class in C++ I have two classes which are derived from a base class called abstract_class. One class is called derived_class and the other is called derived_class2. I also have a pointer to abstract_class called pointer_class. This is how I have derived classes defined: class derived_class : public abstract_class { //..... virtual void print_info(); }; class derived_class2 : public abstract_class { //..... }; I would like to do this: pointer_class* ptr; derived_class* ptr2; However, derived_class2 is
