Clinical studies have shown that cannabinoid system-induced analgesia is not altered in pain states associated with inflammation. The present experiments were designed to test whether nociceptive activity of the cannabinoid system is altered in rats that have undergone a neurotoxin-induced degeneration of catecholaminergic neurons in the central nervous system (CNS). Rats were lesioned with 6-hydroxydopamine (6-OHDA) into the locus coeruleus (LC) to achieve complete and selective catecholamine depletion. One week later, the antinociceptive efficacy of the cannabinoid agonists WIN 55,212-2 and delta9-tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) was tested in a radiant heat tail flick test. Nociception was significantly exacerbated by the LC 6-OHDA lesion as compared to sham-lesioned controls. The antinociceptive effects of both WIN 55,212-2 and THC were significantly lower in the lesioned than in the sham-lesioned rats. The results indicate that the cannabinoid antinociceptive system is downregulated in conditions of nociception evoked by a chronic inflammatory stimulus.click to enlarge Spring is close.
